TEACHERS have before now felt the necessity of learning words apart from their context, and have required their pupils to write out whatever they are likely to forget. But, excellent as the practice may be, it has the serious drawback of being unsystematic; and it is not at all likely to secure that regularity and continuity of effort without which there can be no ultimate success.

The unsatisfactory results obtained from translation are due to the fact that the retention of the sense is more apparent than real, inasmuch as it is not based on an intimate acquaintance with each word. Yet, a systematic study of words is scarcely more satisfactory than translation, so long as there is no adequate provision for their permanent retention.

The plan described in this work, while extremely simple, entirely does away with the strain usually associated with memory work. It familiarises the student with the French text itself, which the usual plan entirely fails to do. It is infinitely easier to connect a sense with a well-known word, than it is to remember the sense of a word that one has never said. The same 8,000 French words are to be read verbally by each pupil every week for a long period, which ensures permanent retention. It is no exaggeration to say that by translation as usually practised, a boy scarcely learns (and retains) two words per hour of work. The verbal reading plan will enable him to learn and remember permanently at least thirty times that amount. He will not learn his 8,000 words by heart, they will grow on him gradually. All he has to do is to pronounce carefully, if not always correctly at first. He also has to think and observe. No matter how bad his memory may be, his weekly reading will carry him through his task far more rapidly and effectually than the most strenuous exertions could do.

The chief object in view being to impart reading power, everything is considered from a French point of view. Therefore, the usefulness of a word should not be judged by its English version. The selection of a word may be justified by its connection with a Continental custom, or by applications which will become obvious in a context.

The student will not fail to discover a logical connection between consecutive words, or between the various parts of consecutive paragraphs, when a slight break has been deemed more effective.

The 3,000 words included in Charlin's Colloquial Course do not occur in this work, to which it is a necessary basis.

WRITTEN PLAN.

THE written plan is especially useful in the case of self-taught students, for whom written work may afford a greater incentive to continuous exertion. It is also convenient for teachers desirous of using the work for home preparation only. It will gradually, yet rapidly, impart a lasting knowledge of a very large vocabulary, without entailing any mnemonic effort. Half-an-hour a day might be set aside for the work.

A great variety of exercises calculated to familiarise the student with the French can be devised, as the following questions will show :—

Write down words of which you do not yet know the meaning ; or words which convey to you, rightly or wrongly, a meaning different from the one given in the book ; or expressions which are not translated literally ; or adverbs, adjectives, verbs, &c., or masculine nouns, or feminine nouns ; or words expressing a material or ideal sense ; or words longer or shorter than the English ; or words having an obvious etymological connection with some English word, such as gelé and jelly ; or such words or expressions which are not connected in any way with anything occurring in the surrounding paragraphs ; or words having some connection with each other, but not found side by side in the book ; or words in which you can detect two or more parts forming a whole, &c.

Confine yourself to one-half of the volume until you know the whole of that half perfectly.

TEACHERS have before now felt the necessity of learning

SIMPLE, RAPID,
EFFECTIVE, LASTING.

FIRST STAGE.

Read, verbally, the French text of the whole book, until you are quite familiar with the sense of every word.

Always think of the sense of what you are saying, and refer to the English when in doubt.

SECOND STAGE.

When, so far as you think, you know the sense of every word, translate, verbally, the French text into English, saying both the French and the English, word for word.

Refer to the English as often as you please.

THIRD STAGE.

When you no longer have need to refer to the English, cover the English text out of sight, and go on saying both the French and the English, word for word, until no trace of hesitation remains.

As nearly as possible, go through the whole book once a week.

In a class, no pupil is allowed to be silent for a single minute. Each pupil must read French all the time, very distinctly, yet in a way not to inconvenience his neighbours.

While one pupil reads one page, his neighbour may read another, or even out of another book, or even learn another language.

A carefully-planned classification underlies the apparent disconnectedness of the work, for, in order to avoid confusion and lessen difficulties, grammatical distinctions are never made between two freshly-introduced forms. One form is first given singly; and, later on, when it is thoroughly assimilated, it is contrasted with the second form. The classification adopted in ordinary grammars may be more apparent to the eye, but generally leads to confusion in its practical applications.

SIXPENCE.

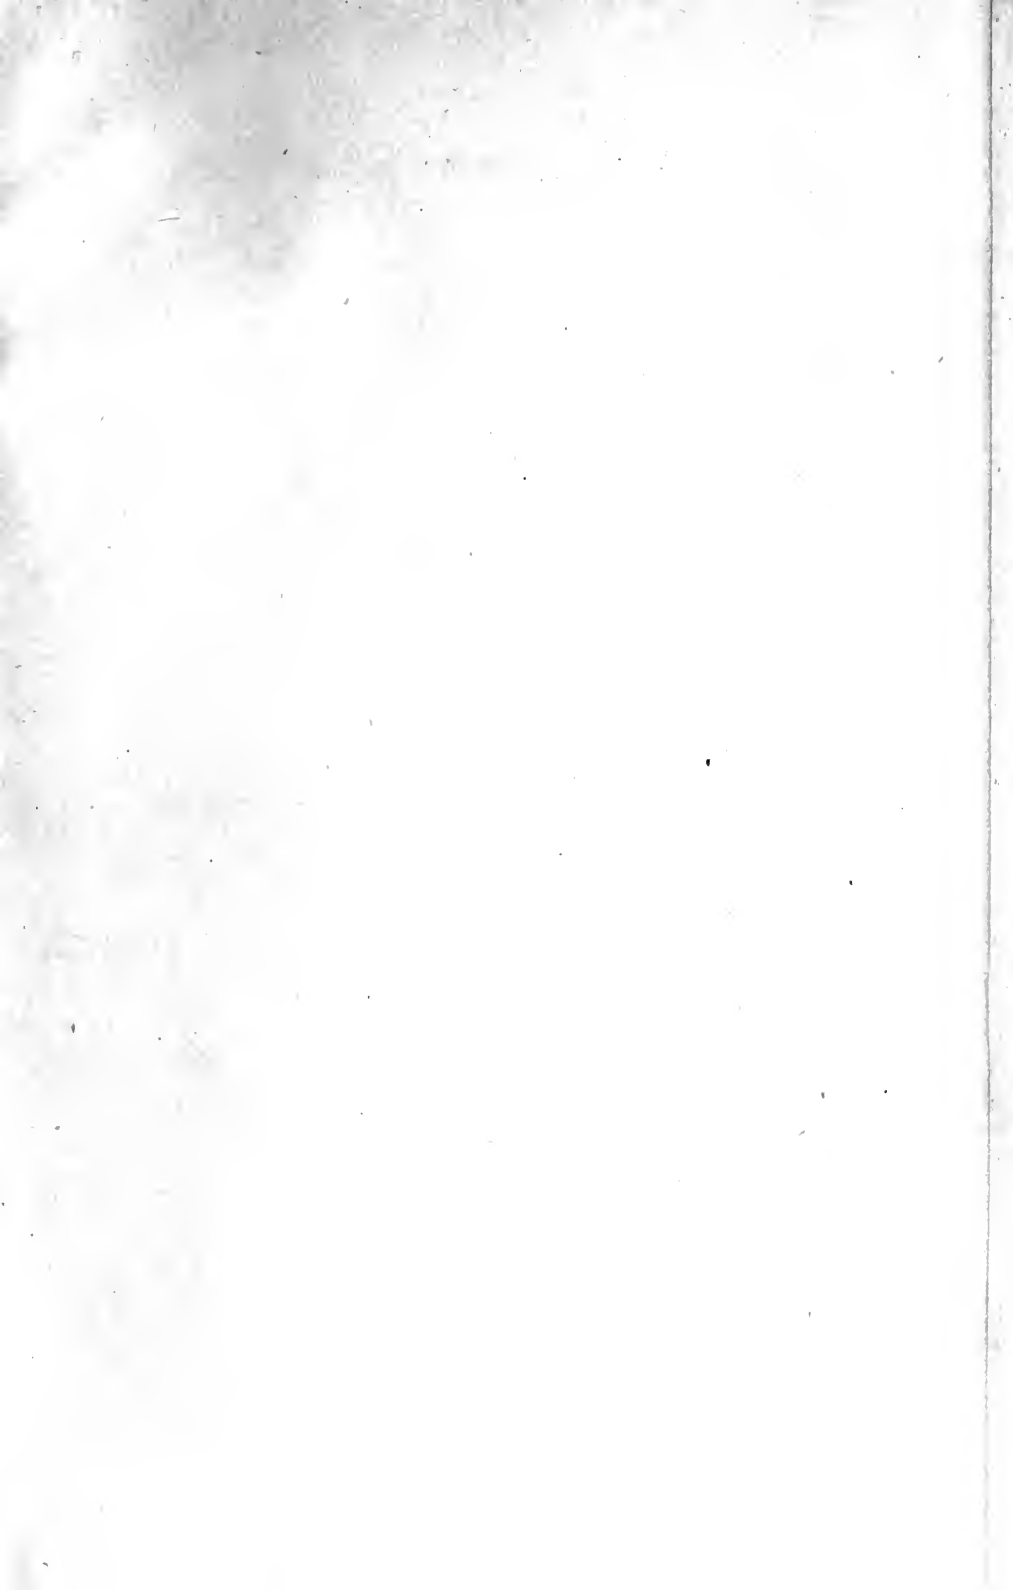

ELEMENTARY FRENCH READER,

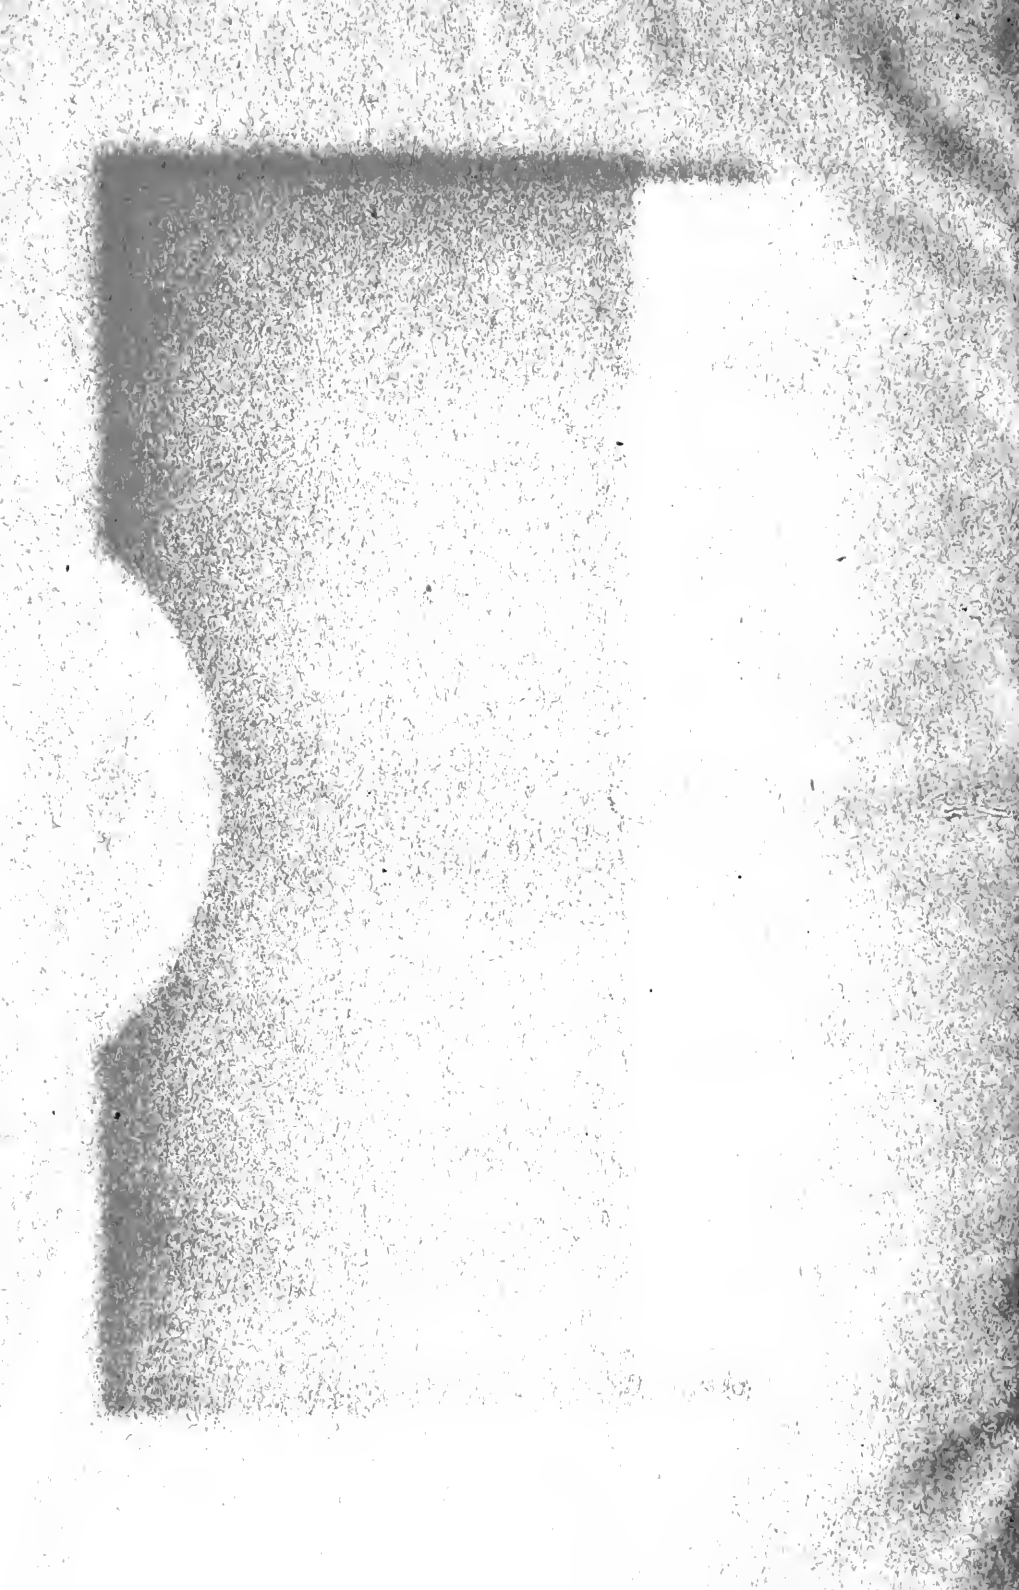

Being a selection of amusing Stories, with a complete vocabulary on an improved plan.

ONE SHILLING.

THE READER'S COMPANION,

Being a selection of eight thousand words and various forms of speech, classified according to their importance, and so grouped as to secure an intelligent grasp of the matter. Frequent contrasts of forms and senses render the text eminently suggestive. While purposely avoiding such context as can facilitate the acquiring of a semblance of knowledge, which is in reality an obstacle to true mastery, a plan of study is suggested at once the most effective and the simplest ever devised, entirely doing away with the mental strain usually associated with memory work, while everything so learnt is impressed indelibly on the mind.
